What we could do together...like before build stronger communities

...working with the Red Cross is fun

Americans trust the American Red Cross to be there. They know that the Red Cross symbol says a lot about the person wearing it. This is someone who made a choice to be thoroughly trained to provide caring and effective help. This is a leader.

That same spirit of leadership and community building is at the heart of your organization. Imagine what we could do together.

For more than a century, the American Red Cross has reached out to children and young people from preschool to college with successful service and training programs as an important way to build stronger communities. We teach young leaders about a wide range of subjects, including water safety, health education, first aid, childcare, disaster preparedness and emergency services.

Our youth programs and volunteer opportunities help children and young adults develop lifesaving and life enhancing skills-the kind of skills that will serve them and their communities for a lifetime.

The Red Cross wants to work with you...and reach out to young people like never before.

Where do you find a leader?

Helping in your community

Working with the American Red Cross offers your group's members many new opportunities for self-development and access to outstanding youth programs, including the ability to choose those that will most effectively fulfill your organization's mission or the community's greatest need.

Our goal is to join forces with organizations like yours who share our commitment to youth development and involvement. Through this collaboration, we can create a dynamic opportunity to invest in youth leadership and build stronger communities.

By joining forces, we can launch children and young adults on a meaningful mission of education, service, responsibility and self-discovery. In fact, many youth volunteers have won local and national recognition for their spectacular community service and have continued these efforts as adults.

Equally important, our research says that youth like to work with the Red Cross because it's "fun," they like what they know about and they know that the Red Cross does important work.

And we feel the same way about our Youth.
